This colloquium presents reflections from a mixed-method PhD dissertation that examines the impact of teacher digital competence development programs tailored specifically for pre-service and in-service English language teachers. The study engaged two distinct groups: one comprised of pre-service English teachers at a university, and the other involving in-service English teachers participating in an online professional development series. The study found statistically significant improvements in the digital competencies of both sets of teachers over time. This colloquium will unpack these findings to provide a nuanced understanding of frameworks on teacher digital competence and how teacher digital competence evolves in teaching professionals. It will also offer valuable insights into the observed benefits, challenges, and opportunities for further research and program development.
